The use of fluorescent monitoring of cross-linking of collagen in aging human skin in vivo. In a previous study, we found evidence for cross-linking of collagen in human skin, by means of the "fingerprint" phenomenon. In this study, fluorescent imaging in vivo on the native surface of the forehead of 20 subjects, aged 15-84 years, was used to study the more detailed time course of the aging process in this area, with a focus on the possible cross-linking of collagen. The fluorescence images were recorded at different time periods after topical application of a special fluorescent skin-capping compound, we used an efficient green-emitting dye, indocyanine green (ICG). This dye is embedded into the topography of the skin, and upon irradiation with near-UV light fluoresces in the excited state. The fluorophore is homogeneously distributed throughout the dermis, and is therefore suitable for topography imaging. The time-dependent fluorescence of ICG was analyzed in this study by two-dimensional and three-dimensional fluorescence scanners. The excitation and emission spectra were confirmed by spectrophotometric measurements. The ICG-dye was stable in human skin, until the skin surface was damaged, as indicated by ICG-fluorescence loss due to superficial injury. Using an original computer technique based on a co-localization procedure, we obtained a fluorescence image and then calculated the autofluorescence-related backscatter. Our measurements showed that ICG fluorescence of aged human skin is decreased in the sub-surface area compared to the younger skin. The results also indicated that the fluorescence of the aged skin fades away more rapidly than can be explained by the "fingerprinting" process only. The time-dependent ICG fluorescence of the intact skin of younger individuals is quite different from the patterns in the skin of older individuals, meaning that the fluorescence in the aged skin fades away slower. After the upper skin layer was damaged by a manual razor blade, the fluorescence disappeared more rapidly. The skin damage resulted in an increased backscatter signal, indicating that the fibers are not as ordered in the upper stratum corneum as they are in the deeper dermis layers, which explains the more rapid falloff of the flu 1cdb36666d

English.NEW YORK (Reuters) - A hard-hit yield curve has reversed on Wall Street and in Europe to reach its lowest in five years, underpinning the case for further cuts by the U.S. Federal Reserve, the world's biggest central bank, for keeping borrowing costs lower for longer. Yields have fallen on Treasuries, Germany's benchmark debt and the euro zone's main 10-year bonds. Yields on 10-year U.S. Treasury securities, at 2.21 percent, are at the lowest
